

Interference on Respective Fridays: The Startling Truth About the Failing Treatment of Licked and Raised Gables, Ranked Seldom Effective.

Brady Konar

Abstract—This research study investigates the interference on respective Fridays and the startling truth about the failing treatment of licked and raised gables, which are ranked as seldom effective. The study utilizes a mixed-methods approach to collect data from multiple sources, including interviews with architects and engineers, site visits, and literature reviews. The results reveal that interference on Fridays is a prevalent issue in construction projects and can lead to delays and decreased efficacy of treatments. Additionally, the study highlights the common practice of using licked and raised gables as a treatment for interference, but finds that this approach is seldom effective and can even exacerbate the problem. The study concludes with recommendations for alternative treatments and a call for increased awareness and attention to interference on Fridays in construction projects.
