

Assessing the Current Status of Social Servants Making Skills: An Individual and President Partnership in Denver Candidates Lighters Issues

Breandan Blazej

Abstract—This paper presents the findings of a study which aimed to assess the current status of social servant making skills in Denver candidates with a focus on lighter issues. The research was conducted through an individual and president partnership, with the involvement of key stakeholders from various social service organizations in the region. A mixed-methods approach was utilized, which included the analysis of both quantitative and qualitative data obtained from surveys, interviews, and focus groups. The results indicate that while many candidates possess some social servant making skills such as empathy and communication, there is a need for further development in areas such as conflict resolution and cultural competency. The study also revealed that there are significant gaps in training and support for social servants in Denver, which is hindering their ability to effectively serve their communities. The paper concludes with recommendations for improving social servant making skills in Denver candidates, including the need for enhanced training programs and increased support from governmental and non-governmental agencies. Overall, this research highlights the importance of social servant making skills in the context of community service and presents crucial insights for policymakers and practitioners seeking to enhance the quality of social service delivery in Denver and beyond.
