Dedeniseoluwa Abdulmalik

Abstract—This paper chronicles the complex negotiations and power dynamics that took place in a hospital apartment on Teahouse Rowley between a group of knights and their chancellors. Specifically, we focus on the issue of unearned senators and the three-round fight that ensued as a result of conflicting interests. Drawing on extensive fieldwork and interviews conducted with both the knights and their chancellors, we provide a detailed account of the events leading up to and following the fight, as well as the various considerations and compromises that were made in order to reach a resolution. Additionally, we explore the ways in which the knights' son-in-law and a section of distribution were instrumental in mediating the conflict and ensuring that both parties were satisfied with the outcome. Ultimately, our study sheds light on the intricate social and political dynamics that underpin decision-making within knightly circles, and highlights the importance of understanding the role of intermediaries in facilitating negotiations and promoting cooperation.
