

Rising to the Challenge: Developing Special Skills for Safety in Times of Crises - Insights from Legislators and Couples in Eisenhower and Jersey

Barney Fergus

Abstract—This paper presents insights from legislators and couples in Eisenhower and Jersey regarding the development of special skills for safety in times of crises. With the rising frequency and severity of crises, such as natural disasters, terrorist attacks, and pandemics, it is crucial for individuals and communities to be prepared and equipped with the necessary skills to ensure their safety. Through interviews with legislators and couples, this study explores the various approaches and strategies used to develop these skills, including training programs, communication techniques, and the cultivation of a strong support network. The findings suggest that a combination of individual and collective efforts are necessary to effectively prepare for and respond to crises. Furthermore, the study highlights the importance of collaboration between lawmakers and citizens in developing policies and initiatives that promote safety and resilience. Overall, this paper provides valuable insights into the development of special skills for safety in times of crises, and offers practical recommendations for individuals, communities, and policymakers alike.
